TEACHING

TEACHING PHILOSOPHY

For me, teaching is about two things: providing questions and the tools with which to examine those questions, and providing a space in which students can try, fail, and grow. Using Freirean problem-posing pedagogy, I focus on the issues and questions my students have about their world, and develop tools to help them find their own solutions. I strive to create learning spaces for my students that are equitable, accessible, multidisciplinary, and socially conscious.

WESTFIELD STATE UNIVERSITY

EGST 102: Introduction to Women and Gender Studies

- This course is designed to introduce students to issues in feminism through a postcolonial and transnational lens. Students will get an overview of concepts of gender identity, social construction of gender, the relationship between gender and politics and power, and more. Using an applied critical pedagogy approach, students will examine current social issues from various perspectives, analyzing structures of power and oppression, and creating their own next steps.

EGST 235: Queer Studies and Popular Cultures

- Part media studies and part queer studies, this class examines the construction of queer images in popular culture. By analyzing the artifacts of pop culture (various media, ceremonies, politics, law, and more) students will discover the tools by which queer identities are shaped and presented to the world. Using these same tools, students will work to create new media and disrupt the production/representation/consumption of media to shift the dominant discourse on queerness.

KEENE STATE COLLEGE

IATAD 100: Art of the Imagination

- I designed this course as an overview of theatre techniques, careers, and histories. Using a combination of applied projects, exercises, group work, and experiential learning, students have the opportunity to try their hand at acting, design, directing, and more. Crafted for non-majors, I focus on skills and experiences that open the imagination and can be applied to other disciplines.

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS
AMHERST

Theater 100: Theatrical Frontiers

- I taught multiple sections of this large gen-ed participation-based course. I built the course to examine the edges of theater—what we are working towards, new technology, new techniques, ethical debates, etc.
- I led lessons and exercises on design, playwriting, directing, devising, applied theater, race and gender in performance, dramaturgy, and more.

Theater 333: Queer Performance

- For this upper-level dramaturgy course that also meets the Junior Year Writing requirements, I designed exercises and projects around a repertory of contemporary queer plays and performances. Assignments included academic research papers, queer aesthetics performances, creative writing, and dramaturgy protocols.

Theater 105: Drama and the Media

- I taught this course online both synchronous and asynchronously.
- The course focuses on using performance theories to analyze media objects. From fandom to surveillance, social media to satire, the course provides several analytical tools for students to become more engaged readers of contemporary media.
- Projects include a satirical performance, a social media archetype branding project, a critical identity analysis essay, and more.

Theater 130: Contemporary Playwrights of Color

- I taught online and multiple in-person sections of this course that meets both gen-ed and theater major requirements.
- Units included connections between artistic movements such as the Black Arts Movement and corresponding social contexts, play analysis, writing from identity, cultural hybridity and appropriation, and writing techniques of contemporary BIPOC playwrights.

Theater 120: Text Analysis

- As instructor, I took the existing departmental model and integrated my areas of focus. I taught EL Fuchs' Visit to a Small Planet, Guerrilla Design, Image Tracking, and other analytical techniques and led discussions and applied projects to develop analysis skills for production.

Humanities and Fine Arts 191: Queering Performance

- In designing this First Year Seminar I created critical and creative exercises to encourage analysis of queer performance, decode images and text, consider the possibility of queering performance. In this course I have combined media and technology with writing and group projects to create an experiential learning process.

English 397: Alternative Theaters: Navigating the Edinburgh Fringe Festival (TA)

- I helped organize and facilitate travel, accommodations, festival experience, and group discussions.

UNIVERSITY OF EVANSVILLE

Theatre 461: Theatre History II (TA)

- I taught weekly case studies and led the discussion section.
